TIN MINING IN THE MALAY $NATIVE\ STATES.$

"Klang" writes as follows to the Strait. Times .- I have road the letters of "Perseverance" and "A. B." on Tiu-mining with much interest. There is a great deal of truth in the letter of the former, but I don't think he has had much practical experience in Tin-mining in the Malay States. Having during the last twenty years examined at least ton separate Tin districts in the Malayan Peninsula and elsewhere, and as I practically understand the Chinese mode of working and also the Dutch system, the following remarks may be of interest to some of your readers. I will deal with the undermentioned subjects in their order, viz : 1.-The Chinese System.

2.—The European Tin-mining Companies.

3.-Suggestions for the profitable working of the European Tin-concessions. 4. The Tin deposits and prospects of the Malayan Peninsula. There is little doubt that the Chinese have worked Tin on the Peniusula for the last two hundred years. They have, therefore, acquired a large amount of practical experience, and every part of their undertaking is carried out on a regular system. A good Chinese manager thoroughly understands his work, as he has probably passed every grade in the mine. He must also have studied the deposits in his immediate neighbourhood, as he is little assisted by any boring, and on his judgment depends the success of the mines. The first step taken is forming a working syndicate, who go and prospect. After choosing a suitable spot, their next object is to raise money to start with, as the miners have rarely much capital. They generally arrange with some Chinese storekeeper, who is also a capitalist, to advance opium, provisions, and a small amount of money, charge ing a houvy persentage on account of the risk. They also receive all the Tin at a certain discount on the market price. Sufficient coolies are then engaged to work the mine, each shareholder taking the lead of the different working departments; for instance, one is the cook and he sees that no provisions are wasted : one is the leader of the coolies carrying earth-baskets: another fills the baskets at the bottom of the mine, thus getting the baskets filled well and moved at a fair pace, as it is not healthy for a coolie to lag behind, and if they have confidence in the head man he is obeyed implicitly. Their first undertaking is the water supply, which is the main spring of Chinese tin-mining; it feeds the water-wheels to work their pumps, and in suitable ground, which when heavily wooded, no machinery could do, and if obliged to be done by manual labour is the most expensive part of the mine. They first erect a dam in a favourable position, and bring their watercourse to the proposed mine with as much fall possible to work their water-whools; they the deposits are deep, getting shallower at a disthen cut as deep a tail-race as they possi bly can, as, after the first mine is finished, this facilitates the washing of the overburden into the old mine. not always wisely. the whole system has been a mistake. I must first state that in my opinion no European company will ever be able to work tin as cheaply as played on both sides, was commenced at Lord's the Chinese. Hitherto the majority of the managers have known little or nothing about tin mining, and in their wisdom utterly ignored the Chinese system, the experience of two hundred years, and considered that if they could get anything under the name of boring tools and a big centrifugal pump down anywhere, the tin would find its way ready smelted into their godowns innings for Ill, leaving them in a minority of 139. indent for a lot of miscellaneous machinery, wheelbarrows, long handed shovels, &c., each to his own taste. by water cheaper than by any machinery. All machinery ought to be of the most portable kind, as sometimes the deposits thin out for a long way before they make again sufficiently rich to work, so that both houses and works should be easily moved. which I will call Allavial 2. Dilavial. 3. Vein.

All the Alluvial seems to have been distributed at one period and under nearly similar circumstances. There is generally stalse or upper deposit separated from the main deposit by well-defined strata, when they open out at a distance from the hills, the main deposit laying on a stratum AGENCIES ORIGINALLY ESTABLISH of kaolin or decomposed felspar quite free from beilica. In the confined valleys, it is by no means so regular, the tin very often resting on the bed rock and occasionally it is so much mixed up that it appears to have been moved a second call attention to some of the Specialities they

The Diluvial, which chiefly occurs on the sides of hills, seems to have been left there by the gradual westing of the matrix in which it quality. was enveloped, and then covered up again by deposit from higher levels. The Vein tin is chiefly found at Patani and the surrounding countries, in Gassen mixed with iron, forming a very hard conglomerate, seemingly having been subject to a great heat. It is found in irregular beds on the high ground, and on the slopes of hills almost similar to the diluvial. The only real veins I have observed are very thin, generally found between the limestone and other rocks, and not sufficiently rich to work, at the Godowns of our Friends I have followed up a number of tin-deposits their source, in some finding no visible matrix, in others I have found it disseminated in the granite, generally very sparsely, but sometimes of over one hundred weight of nearly pure oxide have been obtained; but after blasting into the solid rocks tin has wholly disappeared, and I have come to the conclusion that when the tin is found in crystals it has been distributed pretty generally through some soft granitic rocks (probably contact lodes) which will account for the quantity of felspar forming the knolin, which, having been easily decomposed, has formed the bed for the tin deposits, which have been formed at a later period by some mighty but uniform convulsion of nature. Alluvial tin is always continuous, and not in pockets, but in valleys hommed in by high hills or mountains: it is very irregular, such as would in occur at the present time by a heavy stream of water; in the bays, where the water was quiet, the heaviest deposits would form, and the stronger the stream the coarser the tin and the more irregular the deposit.
